

Remarks on a Palmyrene Aramaic inscription (‘National Museum’, Damascus, C954)*

A relief dated in the 2nd century AD with a Palmyrene inscription¹ from Dura-Europos, which is currently on exhibition at the ‘National Museum of Damascus’², is the subject of a debate from the beginning of the thirties in the last century³ to the present day⁴. Although certain questions related to the identification of some words still remain to be answered, our aim in the present note is to offer some comments to the terms in the inscription.

* This study belongs to the Research Project HUM2007-64961: “Estudio y edición de manuscritos bíblicos y patrísticos griego-árabes y latinos”, subsided by the Spanish Ministry of Science and Culture. I would like to thank professors Simon Hopkins and Ángel Urbán for their useful and valuable suggestions.

The relief, which is 40-46 cm high and 40 cm wide, with a measure of the scripts that fluctuates between 2.5 and 3 cm, depicts a scene with two characters, one of them riding a horse⁵:

The motif in the relief, as can be seen on other artistic features in Nabatene, Palmyra and Dura-Europos, and to a lesser degree in Hatra, seems to be the result of the religious Koiné that was based on Semitic, Egyptian, Iranian and Greek elements, which mixed with each other. Thus, in Dura-Europos, for instance, the Greek colonists brought with them their Greek gods, who live together with those of the Semitic natives. This coexistence of the several deities creates a development and transformation of the religious and artistic situation by mixing the different elements under a gradually hellenization of the oriental towns like Dura-Europos and Palmyra⁶.

The transliteration and transcription of the two lines of the inscription, together with its translation run as follow:

A short linguistic remarks follow below with the purpose of identifying some discussed words, vgr. the proper names šrw, š'd, bnyšm and the plural noun gny', and of witnessing the use of the other words that appear in texts and inscriptions from the Semitic linguistic area as well.

—1ST LINE—

dkrn → ‘remember, mention’: noun singular. The plural form dkyryn is documented in Nabatean inscriptions in a similar context⁷. The root dkr in Sabaean, Arabic, and Aramaic dialects, as is well known, squares with root zkr in Akkadian, Phoenician, Hebrew, ancient Aramaic, Mandaean, and Ethiopic.

tb → ‘pleasant, good’: adjective singular. The root twb belongs to the ‘common Semitic’ and sometimes appears under the secondary forms y'b and t'b. For the several nominal forms in Aramaic and Arabic see the Akkadian etymon tābu(m). Cf. also the formula mdkwr [...] btb in a Nabataean graffiti from Sinai⁸.

l → ‘to, for’: preposition, with equivalents in the Semitic area.

'šrw → ‘ ’Ašrū’: proper noun. Although du Mesnil proposed the Hebrew ’Āšēr (i.e. ‘happy one’)⁹, a meaning that is perhaps related to the Ugaritic *'yr*¹⁰; cf. the Arabic name 'Atīr) as a possible equivalent name of the previous Palmyrene proper noun, this form is also documented in Nabatean sources like 'Ašārū, with a cognate form in the Arabic 'ašir. On the other hand, if this consonantal ductus should be read as 'šdw, we have the name 'Āšadū (transliterated in Greek like Asádou), which is also documented in Nabatean inscriptions¹¹, being a cognate of the Arabic 'Asad, 'lion'¹².

- w* → 'and': preposition, with equivalents in the Semitic area.
- š'd* → 'Ša'ad': proper noun. This name is read in Nabataean inscriptions like Ša'adū¹³, a cognate of the Arabic Sa'd, i.e. 'good luck', which is also documented in the Sabaean S¹'d.¹⁴ The name is transliterated into Greek as Soad(-os, -ou)¹⁵, but also like Sad in theophoric compound names as Sadala(s), Sadaalo(s), Sadalo(s), Sadalla(s), and *Sadallo(s)*¹⁶, obviously related to Nabatean š'd'lhy and *š'dlh*¹⁷, and Safaitic š'dlh as well¹⁸.

gny’ → ‘gods’: noun, masculine plural. Cf. the Arabic collective ğānn (sg. ğinn, pl. ğunūn), with a morpheme of broken plural /ā/¹⁹. The Aramaic gny’ (feminine plural gnyt’; cf. gnh with reference to the goddess ‘Anāt’)²⁰ is related to the Akkadian etymon ginū / ginā. A proper noun masculine gny’ is also documented in Palmyrene²¹. Without referring to du Mesnil’s remarks nor Torrey, Miliik²² and other scholars’ hypothesis²³, we should reject the etymology stated by some scholars, who did connect Aramaic gny’ with Arabic ğinn, whence the latter is badly explained from the Latin *genius*²⁴. Likewise, ğinn does not come from the Ethiopic gennəwo either, as it has been pointed out²⁵. Far from it, the term ğinn is a loanword from the Aramaic *gennayē*²⁶, which comes from the Akkadian ginū / ginā, a loanword from Sumerian²⁷. The concept gennayē (> ğinn) refers to a sort of good minor gods or a kind of guardian spirits²⁸ in the South-Mesopotamian and North-Arabian area. In fact, in the Arabian environment the concept was used for naming unreal creatures of various types and idols as well. Among the Christian Arabs, for instance, the word ğinn is used for rendering terms like *daimónia*²⁹.

- bd* → ‘do, make’: verb, third person singular perfective. The root ‘bd’ has cognates in the remaining Semitic languages. The verb ‘bd’ occurs twice (1st p. sg. [line 4] & 3rd p. pl. [line 9], both in perf.) in the most ancient Syriac inscription from Birecik (Turkey), the old Bīrtā (dated in the year 6 AD), for mentioning the construction of a grave³⁰. The verb ‘bd’ is frequently used in Nabataean inscriptions by the lapicides³¹.
- bnyšm* → ‘Ben-Yišam’ ?: proper noun singular. The biblical Yišemā’ (rendered in the Syriac text of the Pešīṭā like Nešmā) has been proposed as an explanation of the Palmyrene form³². The consonantal ductus yšm ‘can be read in a Jewish ‘bull’ from the 8th-7th c. BC., albeit it is a hypothetical reading that can be reconstructed like Yšm ‘l, because of the fragmentary conditions of the clay piece³³. The name is based on the well-known Semitic genealogical formula ‘ben + proper noun’, which first word is well documented in Phoenician, Ugaritic, Hebrew, Punic, and also in Arabic (cf. ibn), from an Akkadian etymon bi/ūnu. Although a form bn yšm' occurs in Ugaritic dialect³⁴, however, it should be stressed the need to reassert the influence of North-Arabic dialect upon the Palmyrene Aramaic³⁵, as it can be deduced from the number of Arabic names in the area³⁶.

mt' → ‘gift (of)’: proper noun masculine. This form is documented in Palmyrene Aramaic texts³⁷. The name, which is transliterated in Greek like Maththas (cf. Maththaīos < Hebrew Mattēnay, abbreviation of Mattanēyāh), is related to the Hebrew-Aramaic Matta'ī / Mattay, two abbreviated forms from Mattityāhū (‘gift of God’; cf. Greek Mattathias), a name that was popular in late Old Testament and Maccabean times³⁸.

SUMARIO

En el presente artículo ofrecemos unas notas lingüísticas a una inscripción en arameo palmirense, actualmente expuesta en el ‘Museo Nacional’ de Damasco. Dado que dicha inscripción en cuestión viene siendo materia de discusión entre los especialistas desde comienzos de los años treinta del siglo XX hasta la actualidad, pretendemos contribuir al debate científico con una serie de comentarios lingüísticos a todos los términos de la inscripción, pero incidiendo en aquellas palabras que siguen presentando inconvenientes interpretativos con el propósito de arrojar conclusiones más claras.

ABSTRACT

In the present article we offer some linguistic remarks on a Palmyrene Aramaic inscription, which is currently exhibited at the 'National Museum' of Damascus. Since this inscription is the subject of a debate among the scholars from the beginning of the thirties in the last century to nowadays, our aim is to contribute to the scientific discussion with a series of linguistic remarks to all words of the inscription. However, we will focus on those terms, which still offer some interpretative problems with the purpose of yielding more clear conclusions.
